Chapter 1 by SaintSayaka

I was supposed to be genetically mutating a superior piece of bubblegum. That's how this all started, you know. My boss told me to make a piece of gum that would never lose its flavor. And what better way to do that than to go directly into the gum's genetic code?

The problem is, in doing so, I made a human being.

Chapter 2 by Phantim

God gets a lot of credit. I mean, if I could do this by accident with a people of bubble gum. Granted, the technology in 3010 is pretty astounding. I wonder if some part of me did this on purpose, subconsciously... I was a lonely man. In my world only the poor loved and mated. It was the barbaric way of the animals. We screened and picked and plucked at DNA and grew the children we wanted, who were then raised by machines we created. That was the life I had known, never really knowing just how lonely it was til I saw him. That perfect, pink haired man laying on the counter. It's hard to explain how it feels, when you are wanting something that you don't even know exists. I know you are thinking the obvious answer, that I wanted /bubblegum/.

He was afraid of me. He was a scientist that only wanted to create a superior race of people.

He was kept in the laboratory, for maintenance. Genetic mutations often occurred with modified DNA. But he, he was perfect.

At least during the day.
